Bring Them Home

Katrina and Rita disasters, unleashed oil prices and falling US$ are all behind us and once again our attention is focused on Iraq and the War. In between the headlines of U.S. death toll in Iraq, which has passed the 2,000 mark, criticism of Bush's handling of hurricane disasters, and the Libby trial - if there is one, we hear the familiar cry of "Bring Them Home".

There is no doubt that Iraq is producing and exporting oil from her Basra oil fields, however, since this area is completely under the control and supervision of the British Coalition Forces, it is not clear who benefits from the Petrodollars. Whether the revenue from selling oil goes to the Iraqi government, pays for the expenses of the Coalition Forces, or is channeled to other accounts, is not in public domain. For the time being, the main source of revenue for Iraqi government is not supporting the Iraqi Dinar, and that's why today's exchange rate is same as that of 3 or 6 or 9 months ago.

One thing is certain, as long as the U.S. soldiers are in Iraq and the U.S. policies are implemented over there, the Iraqi government can not stand on her feet and govern the country. However, as soon as the U.S. soldiers start returning home, that will be the sign that the Iraqi government has overcome the ethnic, religious, political and social problems, and that the insurgency has been wiped out. Only then the Iraqi Dinar will start appreciating in value, and you will be able to turn your bundles of multi color foreign papers to unicolor US currency.

So let's pray for our soldiers and let's "Bring Them Home".
